Python modules' code is recompiled and the module-level code reexecuted, defining a new set of objects which are bound to names in the module's dictionary. The init function of extension modules is not called a second time. As with all other objects in Python the old objects are only reclaimed after their reference counts drop to zero.

zip() should only be used with unequal length inputs when you don't care about trailing, unmatched values from the longer iterables. If those values are important, use `itertools.zip_longest()` instead. zip() in conjunction with the * operator can be used to unzip a list:

Note. The ZIP file format specification has included support for bzip2 compression since 2001, and for LZMA compression since 2006. However, some tools (including older Python releases) do not support these compression methods, and may either refuse to process the ZIP file altogether, or fail to extract individual files.

Unlike in Python 2, the zip function in Python 3 returns an iterator. Iterators can only be exhausted (by something like making a list out of them) once. The purpose of this is to save memory by only generating the elements of the iterator as you need them, rather than putting it all into memory at once.

The zip() function in Python 3 - Stack Overflow

I'm trying to create a function in my script that zips the contents of a given source directory (src) to a zip file (dst). For example, zip('/path/to/dir', '/path/to/file.zip'), where /path/to/dir is a directory, and /path/to/file.zip doesn't exist yet. I do not want to zip the directory itself, this makes all the difference in my case. I want to zip the files (and subdirs) in the directory.
